********** SHORT STORY OF THE DAY. 2

WOMAN'S WAY.

From the Criterion. Her voice faltered, then died as she raised her eyes from the newspaper and glanc ed towards the bed where a man sprawled at towards the bed where a man sprawled in half-naked ugliness. He seemed to sleep, and with a little sigh of relief the ense straightness of the woman's body ank into an attitude of stupelled fatigue. The man's lids rolled up from his blurred yes and he threw his arm petulantly bove his head.

"I thought you were asleep," she murnured.

mured. "Well, I ain't! Go on."
Her hands trembled a little as she raised the rustling paper and resumed her readthe rustling paper and resumed her reading.

The heat in the low-ceiled room was stifling, intolerable. The heavy air pressed against the woman's temples like a tight drawn bandage, stunning her brain, while the smothered monotony of her voice beat with irritating feebleness against her ears. A great beetle thrashed his black bulk upon the walls, swooping now and again towards the lamp and failing with a thud upon the table. Through the sordid stupldities of the sporting news the woman's voice plodded, strained, expressionless, like the voice of one taiking in her sleep. The beetle in his wild gambol brushed her cheek and she raised her hand to guard her face, shrinking with nervous terror from the thing. Her hot hand rested for a moment upon her brow, which was dry and blanched, like the bone in the desert. From time to time she raised her tired eyes to glance at the bedwhere the man lay. A bloated, pallid man with brutal lips and a heavy fuzz of course black hair on his eyes to glance at the bed where the man lay.

A bloated, pallid man with brutal lips and a heavy fuzz of coarse black hair on his naked arms and breast. At each hait in her reading he shuffled impatiently on his pillow, half opening his evil eyes and glaring at her through narrowed lids. Her voice grew hoarse and croaking, the printed letters danced wildly before her eyes and her hand shook like the hand of an old woman as she raised it to lower the lamn's flaring flame, which was adding the old woman as she raised it to lower the lamp's flaring flame, which was adding the stench of oily smoke to the already benumbing closeness of the room.

At last the heavy, panting breath of the man told her that he slept. The paper fell from her hands and rustled to the floor. For a moment she sat motionless, staring with wide eyes at the form upon the bed. Then, with a swift indrawing of her breath she arose and passed from the room and down the narrow stairs, carrying the lamp, its upward glare accentuating the white ghastliness of her face against the dead blackness behind her. She set the lamp upon the floor, lowering the wick until hut a tiny tongue of flame gilmmered inside its chimney. Then she went out into the night and crouched alone upon the doorstep.

The heat was hardly less intolerable under the low-lying sky than it had been in the upper room of the wooden cottage. The peculiar pulseless hush of a midsummer pulseless hush of a midsummer and grass, night where there are no trees and grass, with their murmuring myraids, enwrapt her. Only at long intervals was the heavy stillness broken by the faint, fretful voice of a locomotive working through the night somewhere in the distance. A row of cot-tages on the opposite side of the street was dark and slient. At the street corner gas lamp east a sulky yellow glow into e hot still night. The woman felt the it of dust upon the doorstep, where her nd rested as she leaned against the door-grit of dust upon the doorstep, where her hand rested as she leaned against the doorpost, staring blankly at the drowsing gas lamp on the corner.

She was wondering vaguely how long a time she might be able to bear the strain and not go mad. She seemed to see herself huddled upon the doorstep of a shabby house in the darkness, and wondered if in truth she was the same woman who, not many years gone, had stood, bright-eyed and flushing, beneath the shadowy glories of high Gothic arches and piedged giories for all time to the man who, rum-soaked, evil.sensual, lay sleeping now in the bare little room above her. Not many years gone, and yet she was already an old woman. Fear and poverty and ill-use do their work quickly. The bright-eyed, eager bride was already a white-faced, haggard woman. Was the end far away? Blank horror filled her at the thought. She saw the coming days and nights of sordid misery—her future, a squalid alley between blank walls, stretched its grim length before her and terrified her. The memory of the past haunted her, shose happy years in which they had slipped from happy prosperity to makeshift comfort, from that to half-hidden want, and then with headlong rush into crude poverty—slipped, while with terrorful eyes and clutching hands she used her weak strength to hold him back. And the end was not yet. Too well had she already learned the dire lesson that the human soul may live and strugges and hold its balance under a very avagard and contents and the strugges and hold its balance under a very avagard and contents and the strugges and hold its balance under a very avagard.

with terrorful eyes and clutching hands she used her weak strength to hold him hack. And the end was not yet. Too well had she already learned the and strugger and hold its halance under a very avalanche of cruelty and dread the disgrace and shame. And this hard truth taunted her with the fact that before God's priest she had sworn to honor, to help, to cling to him for better, for worse, so long as they both should live! Her head drooped upon her breast, her canned wearily.

"My God! Why does he not die? Why does he not die?"

And as the prayer hovered upon her lips nature pitled her and she fell askeep under the low-lying sky, upon the doorstep of her dreary home.

At the first violet gleam of dawn she end of the first violet gleam of dawn she elee is broken often with brutal suddenness. She glanced at the tireless, dust-laden street, and at the row of dingy cottages opposite, from one of which a woman with unkempt hair and flapping gown was looking at her with sifecurable. She was stiff from her cramped position, her step was unsteady and she clung to the wall as she tolled up the stalrs.

In the upper room the gloom was fading before the light from an eastern window the man lay with his head twisted toward the light, his arm thrown up across the pillow glood strangly at the dawning day. She was stiff from her cramped position, her step was unsteady and she clung to the wall as she tolled up the stalrs.

In the upper room the gloom was fading before the light from an eastern window the man lay with his head twisted toward the light, his arm thrown up across the pillow for the paper shade. Something in the rigid stillness of the man's body startied her. She laid her hand upon his brow with a low cry she hent over him and looke and the strangly at the dawning day. She was stiff from sight, and in tist had off the bed with her clutched hands.

And quickly there swept in upon her the memories of her courtship and their early married life, when he had been kind to her band played to her for the bed with her clutc
